

The Midwest Medieval History Conference is the oldest regional association devoted to medieval studies. For forty-eight years it has served as a forum for the discussion and presentation of new directions in historical research as well as a place of warm collegiality. The University of Notre Dame's Medieval Institute is the host institution for this year's conference. Five graduate student papers will open the proceedings on Friday afternoon. Saturday's meeting will feature a plenary address, as well as nine paper presentations in the course of the day. (Conference web site: http://mmhc.slu.edu/)

About the University of Notre Dame and the Medieval Institute

Founded in 1842, Notre Dame boasts a 1,250 acre campus with two lakes, more than 130 buildings, and some of the most recognizable college landmarks in the world. With an enrollment of approximately 11,700 students (8,400 undergraduates and 3,300 graduate and professional students) from all 50 states and 100 countries, Notre Dame consistently ranks among the top 25 U.S. institutions of higher learning in national surveys. (Web site: http://www.nd.edu)

The Medieval Institute, founded in 1946, is the focal point for the largest faculty community of medievalists in North America. More than 50 faculty, together with undergraduate and graduate students, explore the cultures and experiences of the peoples of the Arab, Jewish, Latin, and Orthodox medieval worlds. Over 95,000 books, along with microfilms, facsimiles, and other research media comprise the Institute's internationally recognized library collection.
